

let the MUSIC play

▶▶▶ know your copyright!

What is copyright?

- Copyright protects the creators of original 'works' - music, art, literature - so they can decide how their work is used by others.
- Every original work you create is yours if it is recorded in some form. You can use the copyright symbol © to show this.

What about printed music?

- You can copy out by hand short extracts of printed music for exams or coursework, but not full works.

How do I get permission?

- You need a licence to copy, distribute and perform copyright musical works.
- Different organisations license and collect royalties for their members (creators, publishers, record companies) when musical works are recorded or performed.

What about the internet?

- Many websites offer legal downloading of music. Check before you choose your tracks! If you are not sure whether the website is legal, contact: www.pro-music.org.

Why is it important?

- Copyright puts you in charge of your creation, which means that it can only be copied, performed in public, sampled or displayed on the internet with your permission.
- Copyright ensures that creators are fairly paid for their work.
- You can give, or sell, to others the rights to copy, perform in public, or sample your music.
- Illegal use (e.g. copying without permission) costs the British music industry millions of pounds each year in lost revenue for music creators.

Can't imagine a life without music?
Then be clever about copyright and:

respect the value of music

let the MUSIC play

▶▶▶ know your copyright!

What is copyright?

- Copyright protects the creators of original 'works' - music, art, literature - so they can decide how their work is used by others.
- Every original work you create is yours if it is recorded in some form. You can use the copyright symbol © to show this.

What about printed music?

- You can copy out by hand short extracts of printed music for exams or coursework, but not full works.

How do I get permission?

- You need a licence to copy, distribute and perform copyright musical works.
- Different organisations license and collect royalties for their members (creators, publishers, record companies) when musical works are recorded or performed.

What about the internet?

- Many websites offer legal downloading of music. Check before you choose your tracks! If you are not sure whether the website is legal, contact: www.pro-music.org.

Why is it important?

- Copyright puts you in charge of your creation, which means that it can only be copied, performed in public, sampled or displayed on the internet with your permission.
- Copyright ensures that creators are fairly paid for their work.
- You can give, or sell, to others the rights to copy, perform in public, or sample your music.
- Illegal use (e.g. copying without permission) costs the British music industry millions of pounds each year in lost revenue for music creators.

Can't imagine a life without music?
Then be clever about copyright and:

respect the value of music

